In recent years, much attention has been directed to making genetic modifications to organisms in order to enhance their survival or to confer them with desirable traits. For example, methods for achieving genetic modification of animals, including mammals, are evolving rapidly as the ability to perform such modifications on a broad scale is approached. In this regard, many organisms that are currently used as model systems for the study of genetics and cell biology, as well as for performing genetic modifications, exhibit a rapid developmental cycle and a short life span. Transgenic animals provide a means for performing genetic modifications to the germline of an animal, as compared to other commonly used methods which utilize viruses and chemical or electroporation means. Thus, transgenic animals can be used to carry out genetic modifications to many different tissues of the animal, thereby conferring desired traits upon such tissues. Different approaches have been developed to perform genetic modification of cells and animals. For example, genetic modification of cells is achieved by introducing genes into cells using vectors or liposomes. Other approaches include introducing foreign genes into the genome by homologous recombination. In addition, genetic modifications can be performed by introducing foreign genes directly into the cell. In the area of genetic modifications to animals, one approach to achieving such modifications is by the introduction of a foreign gene into cells that are capable of giving rise to the germ cells of the developing animal. This method is demonstrated by the use of spermatogonial stem cells that have been genetically modified to carry a gene of interest. In particular, transgenic animals can be made by the introduction of a foreign gene into a transgenic animal carrying cells that are capable of giving rise to the germ cells of the developing animal. This approach is demonstrated by the insertion of a foreign gene, such as a marker gene, into transgenic mouse strains that are capable of giving rise to the germ cells. One such transgenic mouse strain, known as the "tlr9 knock out" mouse strain, has been demonstrated to have defective innate immunity. This strain of mouse is deficient in Toll-like receptor 9 (Tlr9), a protein encoded by Five patients with hypoglycaemia-induced insulinoma were successfully treated surgically, and the details of their management are reported. The common symptoms of hypoglycaemia were hypoglycaemic coma (n = 4) and vertigo (n = 1). The duration of hypoglycaemia varied from 2 h to several weeks, and all patients had at least one preceding symptom of hypoglycaemia. An unexpected finding was the delay of diagnosis from 2 weeks to 2 years and a delay of surgical treatment from 1 month to 1.5 years. The presence of hypoglycaemia-
