If you already have antivirus software, then you already know what it does. However, Avira's offering has more to offer, especially if you use your computer on a daily basis. The software uses two types of updates, first and free. The updates apply to the software's core functions, keeping it up-to-date on new threats and malware that may affect your system. The core updates also ensures that you get notified of the security threats that are detected by the system on a daily basis. This program is useful, especially since you can access the database directly from the software, rather than using the Internet browser, which may slow down your computer. In addition to the core updates, you can use the free feature to perform scanning, file reputation, virus and file signature updates. The updates are available on a daily basis, but the company recommends that you perform scans at least once every week to keep the software up-to-date. You can also use the free update feature to keep your computer clean. After performing scans and removing the threat(s), you can remove the threat's files using the feature.
